Molecular pathways in melanoma: exciting developments for the next decade. This review focuses on key elements in the biology of melanoma, with a special emphasis on molecules and pathways that provide new opportunities for therapy. The development of the BRAF inhibitor vemurafenib is the first example of a targeted therapy resulting in prolonged disease control in metastatic melanoma patients. Since the discovery of BRAF, several additional mutations have been discovered in the MAPK pathway, and targeted agents have been developed to inhibit these targets. It is now clear that the pathogenesis of melanoma is a multistep process, and that each step in the process can be targeted therapeutically. As the molecular drivers of melanoma are identified, it will be possible to develop a more precise understanding of the biology of melanoma and the means by which it can be targeted therapeutically.
